

Music

One clear trend in the music industry is that streaming continues to drive most of its growth. IFPI's Global Music Report 2025 says that global recorded music sales reached $29.6 billion in 2024, up 4.8% from the year before. The same report says that subscription streaming was the main reason for that growth, with a 9.5% increase over the year. These numbers show that people are still moving toward paid digital access instead of relying on older formats. In other words, streaming subscriptions that happen over and over again have a bigger impact on the music business than one-time purchases. Overall, the numbers show that streaming is not only popular with fans, but it is also a key way for the industry to make money these days. This change is important because it shows how technology is changing both how people listen to music and how the music business makes money.
